Important Force In Democracy

Syrian Women Voters

In a letter addressed to the editor of the Beirut magazine AL-FATA AL-ARABI, this determined young lady declared that she could see no reason why Syrian women should not participate to would see no reason why Syrian women should not participate in public life while maintaining their status as housewives and mothers.

"Emancipation does not mean that a woman will neglect her family," Syria's Susan B. Anthony said. "Our movement aims at restoring the traditional prestige of the Arab woman, adopting only those changes necessary for modern times."

These words, uttered by the daughter of a noble family, struck like a thunderbolt at conservative thinking of the times. However, Adla Beyhum's voice struck a responsive chord in women from Damascus, Aleppo, Hama, Homs and other Syrian cities. Soon men, too, were persuaded by the logic of her arguments and the status of Syrian women underwent a drastic change. Today these women not only enjoy the right to vote, but they are equal partners in business, industry, education, the professions and other fields. partners in business, industry, education, the professions and other fields.

In addition to Mrs. Beyhum, now president of the Feminist Union in Syria, the country boasts of such outstanding feminine Bendess as Asma Khouri, president of the Feminist First Aid Society; Souad Mardam, president of the Awakening Syrian Woman Society; Naziha Hourania and Wisal Bakdash.

These women, like their American counterparts in the League of Women Voters, are energetically urging their fellow-country-women to take a greater share in political affairs by teaching Syrian women about their rights and responsibilities in a democratically developing nation.
